I would agree with you, but as I looked more at the picture... Here is what you get, in this photo there's actually two things. As you mentioned there is the big darker "Eye" and then also there is a face forming in the mist. You can see the face more clearly when the contrast is enhanced...

But then if you take the picture as a whole, and increase the brightness, and bring the contrast back to a normal level. What emerges is mist, and some patterns. Now granted the one does look like a face. But I wonder if its not matrixing. The mind's tendency to make recognizable patterns out of randomness.

If you notice there are also 2 additional areas that look similar but the patterns are not recognizable so we don't see a face...

Face, or matrixing. I'll leave that up to everyone to make their own call...
